

It amounts to a vanity project

In these days of Conservative austerity, we are constantly being reminded, both locally and nationally, that the country is in financial dire straits. There is no money for health, education, essential services, roads and infrastructure.

So could someone please give me some idea how much it would cost to send a letter on top-quality headed paper, in a top-quality envelope, to every single constituent in the whole of South Suffolk, to inform them that their local member of parliament thinks that a bypass for Sudbury would be a good thing.

We received four identical letters to our household, with the only difference between them being the initial of the first name.

It just baffles me that there is never any money available to pay for the vital services that the country needs, but there is always an endless stash of cash to fund a politician's vanity project.
